William Wilson House

Ingleside

Site

c. 1790-1820

The William Wilson house site is noted because of the small vernacular dwelling which stood on the property until 1983. The 1 1/2 story "hall-parlor" plan house was typical of the smaller houses of the Eastern Shore, many of which remain incorporated into larger buildings. The closest parallels to similar standing houses are the dwellings of the Neck District of Dorchester County.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The William Wilson House, located on the east side of Maryland Rt. 305, south of Maryland Rt. 19 in Ingleside, was a 1 1/2 story frame structure dating from the late 18th century or early 19th century. It was a small vernacular structure composed of a 3-bay 1 1/2 story section with an attached 2-bay 1 1/2 story structure, slightly lower, and more recently a third addition of undetermined size and form. The house had burned in either late 1982 or early 1983 and as of this date (May 1983) nothing remains other than the vacant chimney.

From memory, the taller portion of the house was composed of a hall and parlor plan, with the central door opening into the "hall". These two rooms had had their board partition mostly removed, creating a large space from the two small rooms. The winder stair ascended in the northeast corner of the hall and was typical in that there were about two or three steps to a paneled door. Beneath the stair was another paneled door opening into a closet. The fireplace had a plain surround with integral mantel shelf. There was no cupboard on the other side of the fireplace, but only a recess.

7.1 DESCRIPTION

On the second story the space was divided as the first floor, into two rooms by a vertical beaded board wall with door in center of wall. Each room was lighted by a dormer on each side of the pitched roof. The north room (or hall chamber) had either one or two small windows on the gable.

No other details are in the memory of the surveyor.
